FLAVONOIDS
VS.
COCAINE
by Richard I. Sh琉ki

If you need to adjust the effects of cocaine in your life, why not try flavonoids? According to Richard I. Sh琉ki, flavonoids are a group of compounds that are found in various plant species, including apples, broccoli, onions, tomatoes, and red wine. They can reduce the effect of cocaine by competing with the dopamine transporter, a protein that is involved in the transport of dopamine molecules within the body. This can help reduce the intense feelings of pleasure and euphoria that come with cocaine use.

CHORUS NOTES:
INVESTMENT

The newly formed committee in Brooks' latest pamphlet, "Committee on Innovative Technology," has announced plans to invest in its first project: a new skyscraper in downtown Brooks. The committee, led by Brooks himself, aims to attract new businesses and residents to the area through this investment. The project will include office space, retail stores, and a hotel.

"Piles Between Events"
Environmental Sculpture by Chisto

by Frankie P. Mollis

The environmental sculpture piece, entitled "Piles Between Events," is part of the American Museum of Natural History's annual exhibition. It features a series of piles of dirt, gravel, and concrete, arranged in a manner that suggests a natural landscape. The artist, Chisto, has been creating such sculptures for over 20 years as a way to encourage people to think about the environment and the impact of human activity on it. The work is intended to provoke thought and reflection on the relationship between nature and society.

For those of you who can't attend with the artist, the following instructions allow you to bring his work to your own space: Choose a quiet, neutral colored room in your house. Place the materials in the shape of a mountain range. Enjoy the art and its impact on your environment.
WHERE OUR MOUTH IS

The Naming of Cats

The Naming of Cats is a difficult matter, it isn't just one of your littlejects you may flash to and fro on a silken pocket fan to while away the time: for-- oh, no! No! There-- I have forgotten how a name should be pronounced, or whether it be proper to begin a sentence with a cardinal or an adjectival! But I know--or think I know--which way the cat comes in.

Debate over Nuclear Arms Freeze

by Melinda Nelson

A debate between Daniel Ellsberg and W. Scott Thompson on the topic of the nuclear arms freeze took place in the auditorium of the University of California, Berkeley. The debate was moderated by the editor of the Berkeley Daily, who introduced the two speakers and outlined the format of the discussion.

Ellsberg, a former心脏 physician turned peace activist, argued for the continuation of the arms freeze, citing the need to prevent a potential nuclear war. He believed that the freeze had helped to lower tensions and reduce the risk of military conflict.

Thompson, on the other hand, believed that the arms freeze was ineffective and that it had not prevented any significant reduction in nuclear weapons. He argued that the freeze was a temporary measure that would not be sufficient to achieve the long-term goal of nuclear disarmament.

The debate was lively and passionate, with both speakers presenting strong arguments. The audience was engaged and asked several questions of their own, which were answered by the speakers.

Ellsberg responded to a question about the effectiveness of the arms freeze by stating that it had helped to lower tensions and reduce the risk of military conflict.

Thompson responded to a question about the future of nuclear disarmament by stating that the arms freeze was a temporary measure that would not be sufficient to achieve the long-term goal of nuclear disarmament.

The debate ended with a final statement by the moderator, who summarized the main points of the discussion and thanked the speakers for their contributions.

The audience was left with a better understanding of the complex issues surrounding the arms freeze and the challenges of achieving nuclear disarmament.
