Mr. Gandhi, what do you stand for, universal civilization?

Gandhi: I think it would be a good idea.
"SORRY DAD, WE DON'T HAVE FOOTBALL GAMES HERE."

By Marten LaBonte

Parent's National. These are words not often heard at the LaBonte household. For Marten LaBonte, this year has been a challenging one, but not without its moments of joy. His son, David, has been admitted to the University of Massachusetts, and the family is overjoyed. "We're so proud of him," said Marten. "He's been working hard for this opportunity." As for the rest of the family, things are going well. "The kids are doing great in school," said Marten. "And I've been busy with my own work."

Labor at the Core of Atkins Apples

By Margaret Barrier

In Massachusetts, the apple harvest is a time of great excitement. The fields are filled with workers picking the fruit, and the air is thick with the sweet scent of freshly picked apples. At Atkins Apples, the labor force is diverse, with workers from all over the world. "We have people from Mexico, Guatemala, and even Sri Lanka," said a worker named Pedro. "It's hard work, but it's good money." The apples are then taken to the processing plant, where they are washed, sorted, and packed for shipping. "We work long hours," said Pedro, "but we're proud of what we do."

Draft Beer, Not People

By George Smith

University of California, Santa Barbara. A student has been arrested for allegedly making a threatening gesture at a fellow student. The incident occurred during a class discussion, when the student began to express his disagreement with the professor's views. "I was just trying to make a point," said the student. "I didn't mean to cause any trouble." The university is currently investigating the incident, and the student faces disciplinary action. "We take these matters very seriously," said the university's spokesperson. "The safety of our students is our top priority."
BREAKING THROUGH THE WALL ON DIVESTMENT

The road towards ending Apartheid’s inhumane policies must continue. The struggle against South Africa’s racial discrimination and exploitation is a global one, as demonstrated by the international movement against apartheid. The United Nations has adopted resolutions calling for a complete economic, cultural, and sporting boycott of South Africa. This boycott is supported by numerous countries around the world, including the United States. The African National Congress (ANC) has called for a worldwide campaign of non-violent resistance, and many individuals and organizations have joined this movement.

In addition to economic sanctions, there are cultural practices in which South Africa can be boycotted. This includes the sale of South African goods, the consumption of South African wine, and the participation in South African movies or television programs. Many organizations and individuals have pledged to support these boycotts.

However, the biggest challenge is the issue of investment. The international community must take a stand against investment in South Africa’s apartheid regime. The financial sector must also be targeted, as many multinational corporations have ties to the apartheid regime. The divestment movement aims to pressure companies to withdraw their investments from South Africa, which would have a significant impact on the regime.

The divestment movement is not without its challenges. The apartheid regime has used its economic power to try to convince companies to maintain their investments, and there are still some who believe that the best way to help the African people is through economic development. However, the evidence shows that apartheid can only be overcome by international pressure, and divestment is a powerful tool in this struggle.

In conclusion, the divestment movement is a necessary step in the fight against apartheid. The international community must unite in its support of the South African people and work towards a peaceful resolution to this long-standing problem.
DISABILITY NOTES:
DYSLEXIA: ITS POSITIVE ASPECTS

by Carl F. Todd

Dyslexia, generally considered to be a learning disability, is a neurological condition that impairs the brain's ability to process written and spoken language. Individuals with dyslexia may have difficulty with reading, writing, and spelling, and may find it challenging to remember directions and complete tasks that involve following a sequence of steps. The condition can impact both oral and written language, affecting different areas of the brain that control language processing.

However, dyslexia can also have positive aspects. People with dyslexia often have unique strengths and abilities, such as creativity, spatial awareness, and problem-solving skills. They may also have a heightened ability to process visual information, which can be an advantage in fields such as art, design, and architecture.

It's important to recognize that dyslexia is not a disability, but a difference in how the brain processes language. By understanding and embracing these differences, we can create more inclusive and supportive environments for all learners.
